

Pros

Main library site has an overall nice format, but might be a bit text heavy in some areas like the homepage. The catalog site is nice, especially the additional filtering ability (able to include and exclude things). Some databases or database-like sites are available as resources for users and the use of popup windows for logging in is much better than a new window. They integrated phones a bit with their website, allowing users to receive information about material on their phones to easily access it (basically save the location of the book and have it on hand while looking for it in the library).

Cons

The library overall is outdated in its design and features that it has to offer. Some of the pages seem a bit redundant (for example, the pages when you click on the menu headers). The "Research" tab is not actually what it means to be. For example, Somers did not have video materials to offer for research. The graphics on the pages do not contribute to the goal of a certain page. There is no donate function for online transactions so all donations would have to be made in person. There are no previews of electronic resources. There are different site layouts even within the external sites (catalog logo links to a homepage that has an entirely different color scheme). There is no request page for booking rooms online. Some features that are required for our UX Audits were not available, such as "plan a visit".
